Excerpt: . . . without imputing want of beauty to him, or want of taste to you. Even honey, you know, can cloy--and I agree with you that he is rather to be tasted than devoured--for his similarity of beauty frequently fatigues; or, to have kept up the metaphor, palls upon the appetite. But that, on the whole, you like him, I was sure of before you said it--you could not help doing it, for the gods made you poetical. I did not mean to exceed a sheet, but to answer a question of yours will, I am afraid, lead me into a second. Again let me beg you to forgive me for drawing so abundantly on your patience. You ask me what I think of blank verse--that is, of Johnsons opinion of it. It is certainly a prejudice, carried to the length he carries it, but I have more respect for it than any other of his prejudices. I partake very much in his veneration for the good, old, honest custom of rhyming; this I consider as the legitimate currency of the English Parnassus; but, at the same time, I have no objection to the other. True poetry is independent of all forms--it exists equally in rhyme or blank verse, or even in measured prose; but had I my choice of dress, I would stipulate for the sweet recurrence of the frequent rhyme. I do not think that the language suffers distortion to keep it out...
