The curious come for an hour or so from Ostende but do not spend the night. There is a sense of emptiness and tragedy which cannot be dispelled. Some sort of unit of British troops does duty instead of police and is posted to various guards, the sentries being however without rifles. The soldiers in their sixth year impart a certain liveliness. A party of them at night coming down the middle of the street singing One word of thine, Tell the world you are mine, And the world will be dearer to me in a full-throated chorus wakens echoes from dark corners of the ruins. There is music and dancing in favoured taverns. The returned Belgians do not perhaps belong naturally to the atmosphere of the sublime. They love beer and sociality. They will make their money by some means--they are not too particular how. Civilised ethics do not rule in these places where war has worked its will. Strolling along at dusk past the Cloth Hall tower a bright-eyed Belgian wolf asks you who you are. C'est triste, n'est-ce pas? says he, pointing to the ruins. Triste is what they are not. The Belgian is from Poperinghe. It is very dull there now. Tons les soldats sont partis. Also the mamzelles. Pas de jig-a-jig. Like a glass of beer? asks the Belgian. A spare woman of thirty serves two glasses of ale at a table outside a hotel....
